In Syria on Friday night, a military operation by the US-led coalition entered its sixth day with the loss of more than 10 servicemen, a number that could rise to around 200. As of now, the campaign is focused on the Raqqa province, where the Islamic State group has established its self-proclaimed capital. Earlier in the day, coalition spokesperson Colonel Rob Manning told reporters that in the course of its offensive, the coalition had made the decision to fire upon a drone that turned out to be unmanned. "We shot it down. I don't want to make a big deal about it. It was a situation that we had to live with," he said. Earlier, he had had this to say: "There was a drone flying over ISIS [Islamic State group] at the time. It was a single-engine drone that was flying over the battlefield, and the SDF [Syrian Democratic Forces, the US-backed alliance of Kurdish and Arab fighters] were calling it out, asking for assistance. We were in the air trying to engage the drone on several occasions. The first time we shot at it, the drone exploded, and a second time it flew toward coalition-held ground, and we fired at it to force the drone back into the air and prevent it from hitting the coalition-held ground. "At no time did it crash into coalition forces, but a third time the drone was flying away from coalition-held ground, and we fired at it again. A fourth time the drone flew away from coalition-held ground, and we fired again to bring it down." In Conclusion By now, there are many different possible patterns you could use for automated development. Some people prefer using tools, while others prefer to use scripting languages that you can write quickly to solve a certain problem. If you're familiar with the scripts you're thinking about using, then you're probably aware that many patterns described above are the ways that they're implemented. However, if you're still not sure which pattern you want to use, make sure to ask your self the following three questions. Have you gathered all the necessary requirements? Have you come up with a good strategy for the automation? Are you prepared to implement the strategy on a short timeframe? Tooling out automation does not take place over night.
